

ALFA (BUY, NAV $18.67)

Flash: Sigma continues to sell non-core assets

ALFA announced that its subsidiary Sigma Alimentos has reached an agreement to sell two plants in France, to Grupo Cooperl Arc Atlantique, without disclosing the financial terms of the deal. The transaction includes the plants located in Vernoux-en-Vivarais (Ardèche), specialized in traditional dry sausage, and in Monein (Pyrénées-Atlantique), specialized in Bayonne ham, with all respective inventories, machinery, equipment, and buildings. It also considers a 3-year transitional period to migrate production into other Sigma sites, while both facilities continue operating normally as the entire workforce was transferred.

POSITIVE Implication: This transaction joins the sale of operations in Belgium and the Netherlands announced last October, and is strategically positive, as part of the company's plan to improve Sigma's profitability and growth, by focusing on the leading positions in the main European markets in order to achieve a double-digit margin in the region. However, this is a small operation, as it accounts by only ~1% of Sigma's volume in Europe (~0.2% of Sigma's consolidated volume), while the improvement in Sigma Europe's pro-forma EBITDA margin, after the end of the transition period, is expected by approximately 20bp, recalling that the margin of Europe as of 3Q21 stood at 5.6% vs 10.7% the consolidated Sigma. That said, we consider we consider this transaction to have neutral effects on Alfa's share price and valuation, whose strategy continues focused on detonating greater value to shareholders, while Axtel's sale is still a possibility, and while the strengthening of Alfa's balance sheet continues to be a priority.
