

We no longer expect Banxico to hike after NAFTA 2.0

- Last night, trade representatives from the US, Canada and Mexico, announced a favorable end to the renegotiation of NAFTA
- This new deal will be known as USMCA, and is expected to be signed by November 30th
- We now expect Banxico to keep its reference rate unchanged at 7.75% in its upcoming October 4th meeting (previous: 8.00%)
- We believe that leaving behind the NAFTA renegotiation will help reduce volatility, particularly on the exchange rate, dissipating the uncertainty about an adverse impact on inflation of eventual tariffs on Mexico
- Both of these factors will help anchor inflation expectations in the medium-term

New NAFTA deal finalized after 13 months of negotiations. Last night, trade representatives from the US, Canada and Mexico announced a favorable end to the renegotiation of NAFTA as an agreement was reached between Canada and the US, following a previous arrangement between Mexico and the US reached on August 27th. It is worth saying that the absence of Canada in the negotiation still left some lingering doubts on the horizon, adding to volatility amid uncertainty and significant pressures in global markets, especially in EM. Nevertheless, the deal announced helps reduce uncertainty about the outlook for the economy and has resulted in a positive reaction of the Mexican peso. In this respect, and now that the trade deal has been completed, we believe risk premium around this event will dissipate, as shown by the 0.8% appreciation of the currency in today's session.

Banxico to hold rates in its October 4th meeting. After the elimination of this roadblock, we now believe Banxico will keep its reference rate unchanged in its upcoming meeting at 7.75% (previous: 8.00%) and for the remainder of the year. Although we recognized that this was a very close call, we are now convinced that Banxico will stay put, given the sooner-than-expected and favorable outcome of the renegotiation. In this sense, the potential reduction in exchange rate volatility, coupled with the expectation that additional tariffs will not be levied against Mexico, could lead to a stronger anchoring of inflation expectations in the medium-term.
